Occupational Safety and Health:

a new CIS information service

Since it was set up by the International Labour Office in 1960, the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre—better known as CIS—has systematically collected and analysed scientific and technical information and made it available to users in the form of index cards and bulletins comprising some 30,000 abstracts in several languages.

On the solid foundation of its long years of experience the CIS is now offering a speedier and more comprehensive service as from 1974.

The new service will consist mainly of the CIS Abstracts bulletin periodically providing an overview of the most significant safety and health information (standards, books, journal articles, etc.) becoming available throughout the world. The bulletin will include a detailed subject index; annual cumulative subject and author indexes will be compiled by computer. Each issue of the CIS Abstracts will comprise a selection of approximately 300 items grouped under some 40 headings.

The subject-matter of every document included in CIS Abstracts is identified by descriptors stored in the computer for subsequent retrieval in depth. Copies of the publications abstracted may be obtained through the reprographic service of CIS (subject to the usual copyright conditions). Subscribers will also be entitled to three free literature searches during the year; additional searches will be charged for.

Persons interested in subscribing to the new CIS service (in English or French) or wishing to obtain a free sample copy of CIS Abstracts are invited to write to:

International Occupational Safety
